Summer 2018 Academic Calendar

Items in each module are noted as “read,” “write,” “quiz,” “submit,” “test,” etc. to help you understand what each module will entail. You should get into the habit of logging in on Monday morning, reviewing that week’s module requirements, and creating a time table of when you will get the work done.

Note about due dates:

The due dates for most assignments are listed as Sunday 10:00pm MDT with the exception of Week 7. All items in Week 7’s module are due by Friday 10:00pm MDT. To compensate for the short turn around, you will have access to Week 7’s module a few days early.

I recognize that as an online student, you come to the virtual table with demanding outside responsibilities: work, family, volunteer, religion, etc. As a result, I have decided to not stagger due dates throughout the week (e.g., all blogs due on Tuesday, quizzes on Friday, etc.) because those staggered due dates force you to do the work on MY terms. One of the perks of being an online student is being able to do a majority of your education on YOUR terms. If you happen to have a free evening while the kids are at practice, or Wednesdays and Thursdays are your days off from work, or even that you are a night owl and like to do your homework in the middle of the night – whatever the case may be, by all means, do the work at a convenient time for you on YOUR terms. I respect your outside responsibilities and trust that you will work at a steady and progressive pace to complete each module in a timely manner.

I caution you from putting everything off to the last minute. These modules are doing the same amount of work in half the time compared to a full 16-week semester. In essence, you are doing two weeks of work in just seven days. Putting the module off until the last minute is setting yourself up for academic failure. Remember that this course will likely require 18-24 hours of your time per week, and it is unlikely that anyone can complete 18-24 hours of work in one to two days and actually produce quality work. My recommendation is that you log in early, create a plan of action that spreads out your workload throughout the week, and complete the work in a timely manner.

If the class is showing clear signs of putting the work off until the last minute and/or submitting work that is of poor quality because it was sloppily thrown together at the last minute, then I will be forced to change the due dates of the remaining modules and stagger them throughout the week. Abusing the flexibility that your online UNIV 1301 course is offering you will not be tolerated.
